A message from Mr Marshall

Over the first few weeks of this term the children have been developing their scientific understanding. They have carried out investigations into plant growth and structure, how sounds are created, and how light travels amongst other things. Having an enquiring mind and wanting to ask questions are key parts of being a successful learner and the science ideas that the children have been learning about has helped them develop these qualities. The children have been encouraged to be curious and ask questions about what they notice. They have learned how to make accurate observations of how things change over time. They have been able to evaluate the data they have collected, noticing patterns and drawing conclusions. Firing up children's engagement with science at a young age is crucial. It has been great to see that the learning teachers have planned, does just that.

Sleep Hygiene

Still with Science. There is a wealth of scientific evidence to show how important sleep is for all of us, and in particular how important it is for children's health and learning. We have recently noticed a number of children in school who have been falling asleep during class time. We know this could be for many reasons, but we know from talking with the children the main reason is the time that children are going to bed. Having had children myself I know the challenges I faced getting them into a good bedtime routine - it's not easy, especially in the summer with long light nights!!

If you are finding it difficult to establish a good sleeping routine with your child, I have shared with you a link that has some helpful advice on establishing one.

This can be done anonymously

Please take a minute to look at the following guide from the NSPCC. It gives simple advice about the types of abuse children may be at harm from and what to do if you believe a child is being mistreated.
